

At the Car Wash Institute

No automotive laundering academy is held in higher esteem than the Dinklaker Car Wash Institute. The school's course study is comprehensive and rigorous – two weeks alone are spent on various rinsing techniques – and students don't even get to work on real cars before the third semester. Until then, they have to practice on Francis, the institute's talking mule. And if Francis doesn't get what he considers a decent wash and dry, boy, will he ever tear into the offending apprentice! – usually with an acerbic gibe, but sometimes with his razor-sharp incisors. Harsh treatment, perhaps, but such discipline is one reason why Dinklaker's graduates are always in demand by the world's finest motorcar cleansing emporia.
