

The Eyeballotomy

Mimi had suffered from blurry vision for more than a year now and the ginger ale eye baths weren't doing a lick of good. Her optometrist said she needed corneal transplants in both eyes, but when Mimi learned how much they cost, she sought a second opinion. Unfortunately, she sought it from Gander Bandercreep, her tightwad cousin. Gander recommended Dr. Pringler's Outpatient Eyeballotomy, a do-it-yourself procedure that retailed for only $49.95 (Canadian). While the price was right, the operation required nerves of steel for a successful outcome – especially during that first, fateful incision. In retrospect, Mimi concedes that she probably shouldn't have tried to save time by performing two eyeballotomies simultaneously.
