

Die Falschen Nasen

In March of 1962, during the height of the Cold War, a treacherous double agent blew the covers of master spies Edna and Edith Dinklaker. At the time, they were preparing to leave a recently partitioned Berlin, taking with them information vital to the free world. With their escape route abruptly blocked, they had to scramble to devise another exit strategy. Fortunately, Edith had dabbled in the costume arts at university, and she ably fashioned a pair of very believable false noses out of bits of rubbish she found in their room. The result: the pair calmly waltzed through Checkpoint Charlie without raising the merest suspicion from the Soviet border guards. That's the good news. The bad news? The secret information they'd so diligently collected proved to be recipe rejects for sauerkraut sorbets.
