

A Barrel of Laffs

Professional comedian Jeremy Laff once built a large, cylindrical-shaped house in Beverly Hills and, after his family moved in, named it “A Barrel of Laffs.” It was quite a hit on the celebrity homes tour – until that fateful day when a torrential rainstorm inundated Los Angeles County. Jeremy had framed his house with wool, and, under the stormy onslaught, it shrank by more than 98 percent. The comic found the situation funny, but then he didn’t live in the part of the house that had constricted down to almost nothing. Brunhilde, Beano, and Little Lola did, however, and they did not share Jeremy’s bonhomie. In fact, Brunhilde divorced Jeremy, citing irreconcilable bedrooms, and moved herself and her crumbsnatchers to more spacious accommodations. But Jeremy stayed put, even as his home continued to shrink until it was little more than ... well, see for yourself!