

Heart Surgery

After Daisy had spent ten years at St. Dinklaker's Hospital as a cardiologist, she felt she was ready for new challenges. So when she spotted the online advert, "Heart Surgeon Needed for Rural Community," she applied. And she was accepted immediately, even without an interview! In hindsight, that should have raised a red flag. But she was so eager to move on that she abruptly resigned her position, even after she discovered that the new job was in far-off Punjab. It wasn't until Daisy had sold her house and mule, bid her friends farewell, flown for three-quarters of a day, then ridden in a rickety jitney for another five hours to a village in northwest India, however, that she learned that the new job would force her to develop a whole new surgical skill set.
