

Identische Zwillinge

Bob and Rudy were identical twins. At least they were until they got caught up in the Alice in Wonderland craze of the '90s. Then Rudy started knocking back those little bottles of cherry tart-flavored liqueurs. Remember them? Emblazoned on the side of each bottle were the words "Drink Me." And inside was – well, no one really knew what it was. Just that it somehow caused the imbiber to shrink in size. Really! For example, after a night of unbridled quaffing, Rudy "shut up like a telescope," just like in the Wonderland story! Bob, on the other hand, fancied the "Eat Me" cakes. Along with wheat germ, sugar, high fructose krill, tabasco sauce, whey and protactinium, the cakes contained an ingredient that made the consumer "open out like the largest telescope there ever was!" Get big, in other words. Which was Bob in a nutshell. A very big nutshell. Unfortunately, the process seemed to be irreversible. Rudy could no longer see over the dash of his dad's Hudson Wingback, no matter how many cakes he ate. And Bob – oh, he must've drunk a gallon of that cherry tart stuff, all to no avail. His days of preening before the mirror in a size thirty-six blazer were long gone. Still, there was one part of their anatomy that the "Drink Me" juice and "Eat Me" cakes left alone. Can you guess which part? Hint: it's bigger than a breadbox, but smaller than the bread in the box.
